Mrs. Walter Swornsbourne and Her Son "Chuckie," Whom She Kidnapped.

With bribes of Christmas presents, ... rs. Walter Shornsbourne, of Boston, enticed away from his divorced father her little son, Ernest Westphel. They lived at No. 88 Third Place, Brooklyn. The child begged not to be taken away. The mother was accompanied by a nephew of her second husband, Walter Swornsboure, a prominent musician of Boston. She went to the father's home when no one but the child and maid were in the house, and by promises of presents got the little boy away. The father was notified, and with a detective, discovered his son with his former wife on a departing Boston train at the Grand Central Station. The woman pleaded for her class, and the bystanders took her part. The detective refused to make an arrest without a warrant, and Mr. Westphal saw his son leave with his mother for Boston. They were divorced last January by Justice Gaynor. The musician who is now her husband was named as co-respondent. The Court's decree gave to the father the custody of the child.

The horses were fairly on the tracks when they were illuminated suddenly by the fierce radiance of a locomotive headlight, which expanded with territying speed. A freight train had just turned the curve close by and was rushing upon the stage on a down grade.

Crane urged forward his horses with whip and voice. Whether he could have cleared the track in advance of the locomotive was not certain last night, but there were witnesses who said that he could, if the gateman had not lost his head and shut the further pair of gates right in front of the straining team, thus imprisoning the stage on the track.
